

The iPad Baby Hunger Games

519 Words

After rewatching the Hunger Games, one can only come to one logical conclusion on how to utilize this tactic in the modern age: The iPad Baby Hunger Games. As someone who doesn't know how to use a google doc, watching a baby make in-app purchases is terrifying and enraging. Picture this: rows upon rows of shiny iPads lined up in a neon-lit arena, each displaying the cherubic faces of infants no older than a few months. The premise? A battle royale of epic proportions, where only the strongest survive. But why subject innocent babes to such a fate, you ask? Well, let me break it down for you.

First and foremost, we must address the dire threat posed by the ever-expanding population of iPad babies. Born into a world where touchscreens are their primary source of entertainment, these miniature techies possess a prowess unmatched by previous generations. They swipe, they tap, they conquer...all before they can even walk. Clearly, the only logical solution is to pit them against each other in a battle for survival. We will finally have answers to science's greatest question; do video games really make kids more violent?

But it's not just about culling the iPad baby herd. No, no, there's a deeper, more sinister agenda at play here. By subjecting these tiny tots to the trials of the Hunger Games, we're preparing them for the harsh realities of the digital age. Gone are the days of naptime and peek-a-boo; in this brave new world, it's adapt or be deleted. And what better way to instill a sense of Darwinian determination than by throwing them into the virtual arena, armed with nothing but their wits and a fully charged battery?

Of course, we can't ignore the entertainment value of such a spectacle. Who could resist paying fifty dollars for a streaming service to watch diaper-clad combatants duking it out on the battlefield? Will the baby with a weird amount of hair for its age reign supreme? Or will the underdog emerge victorious, armed with nothing but a slobbery pacifier and a desire to watch Cocomelon? The possibilities are endless, and the ratings, astronomical.

But let's not forget the real winners here: the parents. Finally, a chance to put those hours of screen time to good use. No more guilt-ridden cries of "I should really be reading to them" or "Maybe we should go outside for once." With the iPad Babies Hunger Games, they can sit back, relax, and watch their progeny battle it out for the ultimate prize: a five-dollar app store gift card.

With the Tik Tok ban society will need something new to do with all their newfound free time. And without Tik Tok shop, the American public can finally go into dept for a good cause: Sponsoring the baby they want to win and buying them sharp and explosive objects. With nothing but a future of living in their parents' basements ahead we are really doing them a favor. For the sake of American's everywhere we must commence the iPad baby Hunger Games. It's anyone's game...until someone loses their WiFi connection